Camp is More Essential Than Ever!

Camp teaches . . . and we do it really well. So well in fact that the kids have no idea they are learning. Camp is a kid-tested and parent-approved classroom with a curriculum that delivers daily lessons in resilience, diversity, problem-solving, collaboration, communication (the kind that doesn't happen through a device), flexible thinking, and so much more. We build an inclusive community where kids can be confident that they belong, that they will be respected, and that they are among friends.

I don't know how our current reality is going to play out in the lives of our kids. What I do know is that our kids will be moving forward with a continued need to navigate new expectations, new rules, and new ways of doing everything from play dates to school reading groups. I sincerely hope that our kids will also be moving forward with opportunities to take part in more intentional conversations about race, equity, and our responsibility to care for one another.

Camp is more essential than ever.

Community and Connection

"I've spent nearly as much time trying to understand the strange appeal of summer camp as I have the appeal of a talking mouse who favors red shorts. Quite frankly, I'm still stumped about the mouse. But I think I've figured out the amazing allure of summer camp . . . When all is said and done, people of all ages want to be a part of something bigger and more important than themselves."

— Michael Eisner, former CEO of the Walt Disney Company

What Eisner was speaking to is the unique ability of camp to engender a sense of community among those who are lucky enough to take part in the traditional camp experience. The kind of community that is not defined solely by proximity with one another, but rather by genuine connection, shared interests and experiences, a common sense of purpose, and respect among its members.

Unfortunately, despite our best efforts, the sense of community and genuine connection that our kids have been able to derive from things like school, religious organizations, and sports teams has been greatly diminished in recent months, if not altogether eliminated.

This has left a significant gap in an area that is fundamental to our kids' sense of social-emotional health and overall wellbeing. Schools, religious organizations, and sports teams all build a sense of community and connection as a secondary goal behind learning, spirituality, skill-building, etc. At camp, a sense of community and connection is our primary goal. The other learning and social-emotional outcomes of camp are then able to follow organically and seamlessly (or at least that's how we make it feel to campers).

Camp is more essential than ever.

A Sense of Belonging

Think about that feeling in your stomach when you walk into a meeting, social gathering, or any other situation where you just knew you didn't belong. If you are like most people, this feeling did not make you want to try something new, openly share something personal, or engage in just about anything that would resemble a pro-social behavior. A sense of belonging is a basic human need and of vital importance during our kids' developmental years (it's also important beyond those years . . . but that's for another day.)

When this need is met for our campers, they are more likely to:

- Have the confidence to try new things
- Display resilience in the face of adversity
- Be comfortable being themselves and demonstrate respect for others doing the same

- Show empathy toward their peers
- Act selflessly to support the goals and needs of the group

For young people, a sense of belonging is even more important during periods of transition (e.g., beginning to emerge from a pandemic-driven quarantine) and if they identify with a group that they feel is unfairly or under represented. Ensuring that our campers feel a sense of belonging is foundational to the camp experience. Our staff model, coach, and reinforce behaviors that support inclusivity, kindness to others, respect for our differences, and empathy toward others.

At camp, not only will your child be made to feel like they belong, but they will be given the tools and opportunity to practice the skills necessary to make others feel the same.

Camp is more essential than ever.

Reinforcing a Growth Mindset

"Love challenges, be intrigued by mistakes, enjoy effort, and keep on learning."

— Carol Dweck, Professor of Psychology at Stanford University

This quote is the basis for what Carol Dweck and others refer to as a growth mindset. People with a growth mindset believe that their talents, abilities, and intelligence can all be developed through effort, persistence, and learning (people with a fixed mindset think these things are more innate and cannot be changed). By now, I'm guessing you've noticed a trend in this post . . . and yes, camp is a perfect environment for supporting and developing a growth mindset.

We encourage campers to stretch themselves outside of their comfort zones (trying new things, meeting new people), be comfortable making mistakes, persevere when things don't go their way, and celebrate the success of others. Through the camp experience, kids learn that things don't always go your way, failures are a normal part of life and learning, being resilient leads to success, and it is smart to ask for help from others.

We have all experienced setbacks and challenges over the past few months. Chances are, the next few months may include more of the same. A growth mindset can help our kids better manage the emotional toll that this can have and come out stronger on the other side.

Camp is more essential than ever.

The choice on whether to send your child to camp is more personal than ever. The deciding factors for the summer of 2020 extend beyond finances, schedules, camp programs, and where friends are going. If you are interested in learning more, I encourage you to reach out to a summer camp in your area. Ask what procedures they have in place to help protect against the spread of COVID-19. The answer should be readily available from whomever answers the phone, applicable to the nature of the camp program, and based on CDC guidelines. The camp should welcome your questions and be more interested in ensuring it's the right fit for your family than filling a spot at camp.

Continue to model taking care of yourself, your family, and the communities that are most important to you. Our kids are resilient and, with our support, they will be OK when this is all over.

Mark Orens is the Team Leader, Bar-T Kids Club in Maryland and co-chair of the ACA, Chesapeake Local Council of Leaders.

Why Summer Camp?

“Hey Dad,” my teenage daughter beckons. “I was talking to my friend today . . .”

I interrupt her — “Hang on sweetie, were you actually talking to your friend?”

Her: “What do you mean?”

Me: “I mean, was there sound coming out of your mouth, going into her ear and vice versa?”

Her: “Duh, of course not, I never talk on my phone except to you and Mom!”

Oy. This is where we are at in 2020. The word “talk” has lost its meaning. Communication skills are going the way of the dodo bird, with human interaction being reduced to snaps, selfies, digital acronyms, embarrassing memes, and absurdly entertaining TikToks.

Young people are more digitally connected than ever before, while being significantly less personally connected as human beings.

You may think our kids talk to each other at school, but most schools are now handing children laptops or tablets to stare at for much of the day. When they come home, what do they want to do, of course? They are little screen addicts — and they take after most of us.

Parenting in 2020 is seriously difficult. Trust me, I know. It takes a level of discipline and commitment that our parents never had to deal with — mainly because of digital devices. From the little ones in our pocket, to the 72-inch, high-def, six-zillion-shows-at-our-fingertips ones.

Then there’s social media. OMG! SMH! Likes, loves, friends/unfriends, follows/unfollows, online bullying, predators, and pornography — all just clicks away if you aren’t paying attention . . . so pay attention!

What is the antidote? How can parents battle this ever-growing monster, especially during summer vacation when kids have even more free time and boredom to feed their screen addiction?

Well, there is an answer, an oasis away from screens, where children actually talk to each other using the ancient art of speech and body language. A step back in time, before digital data began stressing us all out: summer camp.

Now, there are lots of programs that call themselves “summer camp,” and most have their merits, but I’m talking about those that are outdoors with grass, trees, humidity, sunscreen, bugs, and dirt. Learning how to swim, and how to hold a baseball/softball bat, a paint brush, and a guitar. Where kids muster the courage to talk to strangers, ask for help, climb a rock wall, and leap onto a stage or off a zipline platform!

And what happens when it rains? I’ll tell you what doesn’t happen — kids don’t melt like the Wicked Witch of the West! They actually have a blast jumping in puddles, getting soaked, and playing. It’s what kids are supposed to do when they are kids. Because once they morph into adults . . . They just might end up getting paid to stare at screens all day.

Research confirms that today’s children are more emotionally fragile than ever before, unable to cope with adversity. Half of students going off to college aren’t making it to graduation day, yet most parents are on an unwavering mission to protect their children from the hardships of life. Kids are kept inside when it’s too hot, too cold, too rainy, too icy. We bring them their schoolwork when they forget it at home. We wake them up in the morning, help them with their homework, and then get mad at ourselves for doing it. But at summer camp, their cool camp counselors can tell them to “figure it out” when they have a problem, and the kids usually listen to them without debate. If our children don’t start figuring out things for themselves, and deal with the inevitable challenges of life, we may find them living at home for a very long time, or moving back when things don’t go their way.

Humans are not born with great social skills. These are skills we learn and practice. As babies, we scream when we are upset, but eventually learn how to express ourselves to our parents and caregivers. Camp is a continuation of that process. Campers are put into challenging situations, requiring them to critically think through possible solutions, just like real (adult) life! Sometimes they will overcome obstacles and succeed, and sometimes they will simply fail — which is a super important life lesson, achieved more likely without parental interference.

Parents routinely spend or borrow inordinate sums of money for college to prepare their children for life. Comparatively speaking, an investment into summer camp is a bargain for the life skills it develops in a young person. Communication, collaboration, creativity, independence, and the ability to make and keep friends are the “soft skills” that employers are seeking in the 21st century, as well as typical outcomes of an American Camp Association-accredited camp.

So consider giving your kids an old-school, summer camp experience that they will learn from and cherish for the rest of their lives — it could end up being the wisest parental investment you ever make. And if your kids are high school or college students, encourage them to work at a summer camp to hone those same vital skills, along with empathy and some serious work ethic!
